

The Roots of Altruistic Preferences

Joan Silk
Department of Anthropology
Center for Genetics and Society
UCLA

Humans are an unusually prosocial species; the beneficiaries of prosocial acts are often unknown to the donors, and do not reciprocate directly. What are the origins of this behavior?

Here, I discuss a body of recent experiments that were designed to examine the phylogenetic range and ontogenetic development of prosocial sentiments and behavior.

Monday, May 3, 2010
Science I, Room 149, 5:00 PM

Spring 2010 EvoS Seminar Series evolution.binghamton.edu/silk