“Past research into how people compete for mates has been dominated by studies on how people self-promote their positive attributes, or how they derogate the positive attributes of potential rivals. One problem with this work is that it has exclusively relied on survey methodology. Thus, in this talk, I will present work that uses the novel approach of facial attractiveness ratings as a vehicle to explore female intrasexual competition – particularly the derogation of competitors.”