Reasoning is generally seen as a means for the lone reasoner to improve knowledge and make better decisions. However, much evidence shows that reasoning often leads to distortions and poor decisions. Based on the theory of the evolution of communication, we suggest that the function of reasoning is argumentative: to devise and evaluate arguments intended to persuade. I will argue that a wide range of evidence can be reinterpreted and better explained in light of this hypothesis.